FOREWORD

by Jan Tinbergen

I am happy to recommend this essay by Ted Dunn on the changes humanity needs to make in the structure of world co-operation. This co-operation must enable us to solve the great problems of mankind: ~~the~~ the problems of security, of poverty (especially in the underdeveloped countries), of environment and of sustainability. Although ~~regarding~~ ^{regarding} some of his thoughts I ~~prefer~~ ^{should} prefer a different approach, I agree with the main structure of a hierarchy of decision levels, ranging from the individual level, via the local, national, regional to the continental ~~to the~~ ^{and} world level. The four problems mentioned, for instance, must be dealt with at the highest, the global level. We ~~must~~ ^{should} consider our planet as an entity, for which an efficient and a just management must be created. We must ~~lift~~ ^{offer} the structure of a well governed nation to the ~~government~~ ^{level} of the world. ~~By the process of European integration we can exercise ourselves, as we are doing currently, and from it we can learn how to go about.~~ ^{From the example} ~~to operate with other regions of the world~~ All this has been set out very clearly by the author, who rightly quotes Jean Monnet ^{on} the cover of his booklet.
